A new creative approach

'Changes in our approach to design were already brewing before the pandemic [started]. We first began with jewelry - introducing [clothing into the mix] as a canvas for the jewelry - then apparel became a full line a few years after that. It was only a matter of time before the [ready-to-wear] started to [take] the leading role instead of a supporting role in our cinema - for spring/summer 2021, it [takes] the main stage.'

IN CONVERSATION WITH ARTIST

SARAH LUCAS

Jean-Pierre Jeunet, Alien: Resurrection (1997)

Throughout the Alien films we witness the slow synthesis of Ellen Ripley and the alien body, both emotionally and physically. This begins with the empathy Ripley occasionally shows the Alien Queen (despite attempting to eliminate her) and carries through to Alien: Resurrection, when Alien DNA is mixed with a clone of Ripley, telepathically linking the two.

In this scene, Ripley encounters previous failed clones of herself. When the only surviving clone begs Ripley to kill her, our protagonist torches the entire room. There is something terrifying and violating about being confronted with versions of yourself; your physical matter having been at the disposal of others, treated as plastic and malleable without your consent.

Alina Szapocznikow

When violence is so readily committed against bodies and it remains a struggle to maintain autonomy over one's own, this image always reminds me of the intimacy, humour and even joy that can spill out from being torn apart, especially when you initiate your own undoing.

Alina Szapocznikow was a holocaust survivor who suffered from tuberculosis and died from cancer in 1973, aged 46. Her work continues to convey the messiness of the human body: a site of trauma, vulnerability and sensuality. Making work that unashamedly faces this can be a form of self-preservation.
